

Abstract

Research has demonstrated that there are differences in the way men and women perceive financial issues. This article provides a summary of one such study, and presents several findings and conclusions in the hope of giving financial advisors insight into gender-influenced factors that may explain clients' spending behaviors.